<sup>14</sup> In humanities and social sciences, conference proceedings papers usually are not peer–reviewed and not considered as significant as peer–reviewed journal articles. However, in the disciplines of computer science and engineering, a vast majority of the peer–reviewed publications are in the form of conference proceeding papers, which have become the primary channel of research communication in these disciplines. The majority (88%) of peer–reviewed papers with the highest impact factors are papers in conference proceedings (Shamir, L. (2010) The Effect of Conference Proceedings on the Scholarly Communication in Computer Science and Engineering. Scholarly and Research Communication, 1(2):1–7).
